TALLINN, March 24 (Reuter) - An activist in Estonia of Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky's Liberal Democratic Party was put on a train headed for Russia on Friday after officials ordered his deportation for undermining Estonia's fledgling constitution.

National radio reported that Russian citizen Piotr Rozhok was put on the Tallinn to Moscow train shortly after 6 p.m. (1600 GMT), accompanied by two police officers who would escort him to the border.

Police said they had arrested Rozhok in Tallinn after he failed to comply with an order from the Citizenship and Migration Department to leave the country by Friday morning.

The train was due to arrive at the border near the city of Narva at around midnight.

"Since 1993, Piotr Rozhok has been regularly committing acts which can be viewed as subversive activity against Estonia's constitutional order and territorial integrity," Ene Rebane, director general of the citizenship department, told reporters.

Rozhok had attempted to hamper the restoration of Estonia's independence, secured from the former Soviet Union in 1991, and had also made several anti-Semitic statements, she added.

According to Rebane, Rozhok last month appealed to a rally of the Russian Citizens Union in Narva not to comply with the Baltic state's laws.

"He called on (people at) the rally not to apply for residence permits, claiming that Estonia is ancient Russian territory," she said.

Under Estonia's aliens law, non-citizens have to apply for residence and work permits.

About 38 percent of the 1.5 million population are non-Estonians, mainly ethnic Russians but also Ukrainians and Belarussians. An increasing number are becoming naturalised.

Earlier this week Rozhok, who worked as a boilerman in Tallinn port, pledged he would not leave voluntarily.

"I do not consider myself a foreigner here," he was quoted as saying by the national news agency ETA.
